Homemaker Hints

Since warm weather has arrived and our youngsters will be playing outside more and more, let's think about the child's safety while out-of-doors.

The very young children don't have experience or judgment to realize the danger in many of their activities, Parents are the main source of information on safety, so keep the child aware! Don't be afraid to enforce strict disciplinary measures when it comes to your child's carelessness.

Automobile traffic is a big area of concern, Repeatedly warn your child against running in the roadway, chasing objects such as balls and crossing the road alone. These warnings may need reinforcing by telling him he may be run over by a car before the driver can stop it. This is probably the best (and only) time that actually scaring the child would do good.

Bicycles also are a dilemma to parents until children learn to control them. The heavy increase in traffic during the warm months should limit small children to sidewalks, parks, or fields. This may be hard for the child to understand, but is much better than taking chances. Only when you are certain of your child's competency should you let him ride near the road.

CAREFUL to crush all smokes dead out.
